Visual, physical or intellectual impairments can restrict the use of digital services. Equal access to digital public information and services has become even more critical since the start of the pandemic. The Web Accessibility Directive aims to make the websites and mobile applications of public sector bodies more accessible to everyone, in particular people with disabilities. In 2020, the Commission closed the seven remaining infringement cases for delays in transposing the Web Accessibility Directive. It continues to assess the conformity of national transposition measures and the correct application of the Directive.

A key element of Europe's social market economy is fair working conditions, which includes preventing employment relationships that lead to precarious working conditions. The Commission further pursued a case against Italy concerning less favourable treatment and the lack of protection against abusive successive fixed term employment. The goal was to protect workers in the public sector such as teachers, healthcare workers, professionals in the arts, music and dance education, staff in some musical production foundations, academic personnel, public sector agricultural workers and voluntary staff in the national fire brigade.
